

WNTC Divided Into Four Groups

On Tuesday night, the first organizational meeting of the long-awaited campus radio station, WNTC, was held. After quickly accomplishing the major business on hand, namely the introduction of the new staff members to the station officers, and the reading of the constitution, the members were broken down into four groups, the committees which will handle the main functions of the station.

First, there is the Business Committee, whose job is to maintain all books of accounts, and to supervise all sales, purchases, and other financial operations.

Secondly, there is the Engineering Committee, which is responsible for the design, construction, and maintenance of the station facilities, as well as the training of the staff to handle these.

At the moment this committee looms as the most important, since it is they who will actually construct the first broadcast studio and necessary equipment. Work on this is expected to get underway immediately, as Tom Harris, Head of Construction, has already been given the go ahead sign by Nick Sfikas, Station Manager.

Next is the Programming Committee, the largest of all, whose responsibility is the "choosing and arranging of all programs, and the production of these programs." This includes "announcers, actors, control room engineers, producers, script writers, etc."

Last is the Publicity Committee, which handles public relations, and is responsible for publicizing all programs, special broadcasts, and station policies, as well as acting as complaint department.

At the moment, even though there are close to one hundred staff members, the station is still short-handed. The major derth is the lack of experienced help; however, since there is so much work concerned with organizing and running a radio station, there is more than ample room for anyone willing to sacrifice a little time and energy each week. Of course, staff members must give WNTC first priority on their extracurricular activities list. In return, they will receive many hours of fun and enjoyment.
